Focial Troglodytes. (From the Saturday Review.)

Some ancient writers have left us accounts of curious race of neorle to whom they gave the name of Tenglodytes. These strange beings had no houses, but lived in holes which they dug in the ground. They had no words with which to express such ideas as they may have passessed. but resorted to uncouth and inarticulate sounds. At the sight of a stranger they escaped swiftly into their holes, while even with one another they held but little interconres. Various other particulars are recorded of their habits, all forming a most astonishing picture of what human nature oan come to, or rather, perhaps, of what it could necand from. Yet, after all, the lowest araires, of civilization at different epochs are, as a role winderfully like one another. Circumstances change and external conditions after, but an ingenious inquirer has no difficulty in tracing a substantial recemblance at bottom between the barburaneness of different periods, and even the most polished age is sure to contain a class of people, in a stage of comparative barbarism. It would not be in any way surprising, therefore, if we should find that, after the lange of so many hundreds of years, there are still those among us whom it is impossible not to recognise as the representatives of the ancient troglodytes. This, indeed, proves to buthe case. The troglodyte is still among us, and felt by the old geographers, the habits and mon. Paper. ners and feelings of this most extraordinary and entertaining creature. True, he no longer digs a hole in the earth to live in, and he conforms so for to the ways of his fellows as to use articulate words, but he i in one sense as remote from the baunts of manking as if he were spiourning in the very bowels of the earth. He live fenced round with an atmosphere, and that the very reverse of luminous, of dense moral isolation. What to others are the pleasures of engial existence to him are its prins. What interests the more civilized notion of his contemporaries only serves to bore him, and this not because he is a philosopher who views human desires and interests with jedifference or contempt, or because he is a Paritan who views them with pious horror, or because he is absorbed in important business and cannot spare time for divoration, but simply because he is a tragladyte. frequently to be found in the povinces then in the metropolis. In old country towns one is perpetually encountering whole colonies of them. distinctly organised upon tropladytic principles. fines or Residence. These little communities est and drink, and marry and are given in marriage, very much to all appearance like their nighbours. It is not until you have mixed among them." and listened, to their babitual talk, and collected their praystant ideas. that their characteristic peculiarities are visible. . An endeavour to introduce any of the subjects engaging the most solive minds of the day, or to discuss passing events as if they were actually taking place, meests with a chilling reception that might convince the Most audacions that he is vainly trying to drag his companions into a region that is at once mysterious and hateful to them. They do not understand what he wants them in talk about, and they have not the faintest desire to understand it, but only wonder darkly. and almost malignapily, how any living being comes to worry hinself shout such things: If a philosopher wishes to see this lethergic temhave said, is at least brought into contact with the rate, interests of his kind in the business of brendwinning; but the wife of his bosom and the nariner of his dull joys is not reminded even in this way that she is a member of a complex and active society, and that there is a momentous and constant conflict of opinions and interests and ideas going on around her. There is something grand in the sublime stupor, the deathlike anathy; of women of this stamp about everything that ones on out side-and sometimes inside—their own doors. The most exciting and important political discussion rifah of anathy . In an ordinary way, the single | Offices, Stables and Godowes field, outside of the domestic cave, in which they permit themselves to disport their embryonic intellects, is a little sont which they call their religion. Here they display a sort of alacrity which is more unbecoming than any amount of anathy. Here they are conserved by a nour, narrow thin energy, which is all the more astanishing and disagreeable because we know that they bare no reason for the faith that is in them, no benevolent or honest wish that truth should are-l vail, no sincere interest in the welfare of those of these serid and unwholesome mental humours that are bred by their mode of life. If a woman is to be a tenglodyte, she is pleasanter to hor! neighbours if she follows the ways of her tribe to the very and, and excluding overvibing alika from her attention, never wanders out of the dimlight of her own cave. For there is something of soite in the composition of the c-eature. Inthe old writers say, used to big a corper neck and heels together, and having hung it up, would proeved to palt it with stones, smid loud rears of laughter. The grotesque ferocite of such proceedings gives one a capital notion of the nature of trogiodyte, more especially of the gentler sex. semble and maite with other pannle, it is always I mu be ladened and discharged for polting purposes. To the up someholy who has done something which, so far as they can undergrand they do not like; and then to throw stones, amid laughs and showery titterings, and the wretched victim—this is the best fun they them all rushing out of their boles with all monner on the 1st February. of uncouth chucklings and mumblings; for most tragiodates are social enough to be quite ready to wash their neighbour's dirty linen in public at a moment's notice. They are lostly to let the dead hury their dead, to leave the horotic to deal with his own understanding, and the unfaithful wife to the micery which has befallen her. cumplied with until there has been a hoisting and two. THE PROBULTING DIFFICULTY. - We have, in fact three armics—one for India, one for the colonies. and one for service at home. Still at the autside, we are now morely raising a force of 210,000 men from a population of 30,000,000; whereas 50 years ago-in 1813, for instance-we raised and maintained a force of 237,000 regular soldiers from s nonulation of less than 20,000,000. Nor will i indeed, Thave hean forgotten that the Pederal States of America kept a million soldiers in the field for four years together out of a nonulation of 21,000,000, while even this proportion was exceeded by their enemies in the South. There, or course, were exceptional efforts, and not to be contrasted with the numbers of a regular establishment in time of poece, but still it must be clear that the difficulty caw experienced in recruiting our army cannot be ascribed to the excessive magmuch in annalments ag in re-collectments. At the | a superficial area of about 19000 source feet. are of 28-that is, with all the hest years of his life before him—a soldier may claim his discharge from the army, and then, of he is a man of good character and average intelligence, he becomes a very desirable servant in the eyes of an employer. Such a man can command probably so good a wage FIHE Upner Floor of the Detached House that it might be hard for the State to recure him against private bidders. Yet the trial should be made, and as Bit per cent, of these man do actually re-enlist, perhaps a little better offer would attract game of the remainder. Lord Harrington to the pay of such men would cost the country £200,000 a year; but Colonel North remarked upon this that when a man on foreign service did not re-enlist, but took his discharge, it cost the country upon an average £33.6s. ld. to bring him come again. That £33 of passage money would have provided his extra pay for just ten years. However, we look at the case with very little unforce is evidence enough of that; but under the unfavourable circumstances of large demand, brisk competition, and quiet times, the work of ordinary recruiting drage a little. We hove the commission may discover some means of easing and accelerating it, but we ought nevertheless to sconomise our resources by the employment of usrive auxiharies on foreign stations, and le spare ne pains ! in averting for the futbre any risk of such calumities as that recently suffered at Hong-Kong .--
